WEATHER CONDITIONS.

U. S. Dept. of Agriculture. Weather Bureau,
Washington, D. C., October 3, 1919.
The disturbance in the Middle States has continued to move castward slowly, and during Monday it caused general rains from the upper Lake region southward over the Mississippi, the lower Missouri and lower Arkansas valleys to the Gulf of Mexico. Showers have also occurred in Florida and southern Georgia. The storm which was noted in southern Alaska Sunday is rapidly overspreading the north Pacific coast recton. It is the first storm this autumn of whater type in that section, and marks the beginning of the rainy season.

The temperature has begun to rise again in the Great Lake region, the upper Ohio Valley, and North Atlantic States, but has fallen between the Mississippi Valley and the eastern slope of the Rockies, but risen again in the Rocky Mountain region itself. The temperatures are still considerably above the seasonal normal throughout the corn belt, although much higher in the eastern than the western portion.

Showers are indicated for the Great Lake region, the Ohio Valley, the lower Mississippi Valley, and the Gulf States, also for the northern Rocky Mountain region, while the weather will be mostly fair in Atlautic sections Tuesday and Wednesday.

The temperature will rise slowly in eastern sections and the central valleys. In fact, it will be above the seasonal normal for two or three days in nearly all districts over the eastern half of the country. Continued warm weather is promised for in nearly all districts over the eastern half of the country. Continued warm weather is promised for the corn belt. Steamers departing Tuesday for European ports will have moderate southeasterly winds, with gen-erally fair weather to the Grand Banks,
